Photodynamic therapy (PDT) is a cancer treatment in which a sensitizer is administered to a patient and is then irradiated with visible light in the presence of oxygen to cause the sensitizer to absorb photons and thus activate a reactive oxygen species (ROS) that kills tumor cells (FIG. 1). However, unbound sensitizers may also be activated, and ROS generated by these inactive sensitizers can damage normal tissue surrounding the tumor. To obtain tissue-specific delivery of the sensitizer, a photosensitizer conjugated with antibodies is often used. For example, antibodies with specificity to a cell-surface antigen of a cancer cell or an antigen expressed on the surface of vascular endothelial cells are bound to a photosensitizer. During the PDT process, the antibody-photosensitizer conjugate is delivered to the tumor. Upon irradiation of the tumor with light, the activated sensitizer can activate a photo reactive species, causing the cancer cells to die. 673 P.2d 1327 (1983) 47 Or.App. 463 In the Matter of the Suspension of the Driving Privilege of Mark E.
