And there's more! Adobe has also announced that for the first time Adobe software will be available on the Apple Watch with the release of Photoshop Mobile 11.0.0, but by itself it does not make this software application 'mobile' - rather it takes the features you know and love from Adobe Photoshop and puts them at your fingertips, wherever you are. As an example, you can toggle the work area to full screen mode or get instant feedback on your results using the Creative Cloud Workspace for iPad or Chrome. And finally, Adobe has announced the immediate availability of a new Photoshop Elements Maven subscription plan that enables you to download new features as they release, while giving you access to the previous versions of Creative Cloud software, which you can re-download at any time. It's something to think about. In the last few years, the digital imaging world has taken an exciting turn towards new media. Pioneered by the likes of Apple in their iPhoto app and other apps on iOS, it's now being used in more products and formats, giving us new ways to communicate a wide spectrum of information directly to our friends, families, and colleagues. In this new digital era, we're looking toward new integration between the new generation of devices, and the digital content being created. Apple's icloud service offers the ability to resize, share, and stream photos — all without much effort. Digital cameras now capture photos and videos directly into the icloud photo app. With this integration in mind, the time has come for Photoshop to rethink how it works with these new devices, and how it works with the entire content creation process.
