It's version 5.0 of the already-best-in-class Photoshop software, and it continues to establish itself as Apple's default photo editor and image manager. If you've been paying attention to the photography and editing space for some time, you might already know that Lightroom has the lionâ□□s share of the market share. You may even recall some angst or puzzlement at some version or otherâ□□version 4?â□□when Lightroom was replaced by Photoshop a few years back. Donâ□□t worry: that angst and puzzlement was probably misplaced. Lightroom 5 is Lightning, smooth as silk. It's hard to imagine this reference class of a software package having any kind of difficulty on the Mac. It's just great. The interface is clean, simple, and easy to follow. The new functions like Lens Correction and Lens Profile Editor are second to none. Adobe now allows for rectangular layers, improved simulation performance, embedded ColorSync profiles, and ICC profiles are added to the PSD. These features are worth checking out and will likely be appreciated. smart Sharpen, Lens Correction, Improved Exposure, Pixelate De-Noise, and Spot Removal (all new functions for Lightworkers) are some of the new features to look out for. The new Photoshop features show a willingness to improve upon established functions, something Lightroom has lacked in the past. New Actions give you the ability to script complex tasks within Photoshop, so that you can create powerful Photoshop actions that can be used efficiently when you work in bulk. You can, for example, twist the color balance on an image, supplement by adding a custom summary to a file. You can also sync a Lightroom catalog with Photoshop. For example, you can view a live view of your Lightroom catalog in Photoshop, where you can adjust perspective and set the number of items being shown. This type of Live Data Organizing (LDO) training is helpful: You can use this new ability to group your images into categories and see what's inside, helping you organize and clean up your image storage. The best part of this new feature is that it is available in both Photoshop and Lightroom.
