When you edit in the Layers palette, you'll see the current status of the image's layers in the Layers palette. Click on the Layers icon at the top-right to see the Layers palette. In the Layers palette, you can adjust the Opacity for each layer, plus you can create or delete layers as you need. My newer complaint is with the way in which Photoshop Elements handles desktop themes. When working from a Photoshop template, one can no longer use a pre-existing default for the desktop. One can create a new desktop for every new session, but then it is not possible to reproduce the desktop settings each time. The new Citrus theme was my issue. In fact, it seems that every newer version of Elements, there's a new way in which one must customize and personalize the theme. It required three steps to recreate my old custom desktop:

- First, select "Edit > Preferences > General > Appearance > Desktop"
- Second, choose "New..." to open "New Theme..."
- Third, make any changes I wanted to the part that says "This is the default theme for this workspace."

I haven't seen a way to name a "custom" desktop the same way I would a theme in Photoshop Elements. For this reason, I find the new application to be less user-friendly. It used to be fairly easy to go in and make major changes. Now, that's harder. Lightroom 5 is the latest version of Adobe's light editing/organizing software, Adobe Lightroom, and it is now available on both Mac and Windows platforms. Stick around until I have the latest version in my hands to make a more accurate comparison.
