You can start work on features that you want to be included in the next version of an existing application without cluttering the market by bringing them to everyone at once. Or, you can file these features as WIPs for later inclusion in a future release. You'll be asked to file your new features as WIPs when you start working. Smaller, lower-risk features don't have this constraint. Once you're ready to deliver them, you'll notice that you can just deploy them with the same tools and settings that you use already. This new release cycle also accommodates Cross-Platform Builds. To implement optional features in different releases, you'll just build each release twice, once for each set of platforms and devices. While this doesn't involve any more effort, it does require you to build for a variety of devices and platforms. Features like JavaScript scripting or spell checking can't be used by multiple platforms at once.
